Prudence Of A Spy

Senator Church of Idaho, whose courier couldn't get inside the Central Intelligence Agency to deliver a letter to Director McCone, makes a good point: Suppose he had been sending McCone "some information of very great importance" and couldn't get it past the barricades.

The senator himself does not seem to regard this as a likely supposition, but he's entitled to an answer, which so far has not been forthcoming from McCone.

Maybe this is what happened: The guard who intercepted the courier garbled the message and told McCone Senator Church was waiting outside to make a speech—in which case the guards had every right to fix bayonets.

Or perhaps it got to McCone in still more garbled form that a suspicious individual named Zenita Churchov ~~was~~ was trying to get in. The British situation being what it is, McCone should have been crazy to let him inside.
